[CRIMINAL REVISION NOS: 43-2-2010, 43-3-2010, 43-4-2010 & 43-5-2010]

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE: Revision - Remand proceedings - Magistrate rejecting application for remand order - Whether desirable for magistrate to state reasons for rejecting such application - Criminal Procedure Code, s 117

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE: Revision - Remand proceedings - Magistrate rejecting application for remand order - Whether use of phrase 'acquitted and discharged' in remand proceedings incorrect

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE: Trial - Evidence, recording of - Mode of taking and recording evidence - Evidence to be recorded in legible handwriting

On 12 March 2010, 19 Indonesian fishermen ('the respondents') were arrested for illegally fishing in Malaysian territorial waters in unregistered foreign fishing vessels. The offence was investigated under s. 15(1)(a) of the Fisheries Act 1985 ('the Act'). Investigations could not be completed within 24 hours and on 13 March 2010 all the 19 respondents were produced by the Investigating Officer ('IO') before the Assistant District Officer in four separate applications for a further detention of three days under s. 47D of the Fisheries Act 1985. The Assistant District Officer ordered that all the 19 respondents be detained for three days to enable the IO to complete the investigations. However on 15 March 2010 the IO produced all the 19 respondents before the magistrate in Manjung, in four separate applications for a further detention order from 15 March 2010 to 25 March 2010 to enable the IO to complete the investigations. The magistrate rejected all the four

A applications. She refused to order the further detention of the respondents and instead ordered all 19 respondents to be 'discharged and acquitted' ('dilepaskan dan dibebaskan') from remand detention. The Legal Advisor of the Malaysian Maritime Enforcement Agency applied to the High Court for a revision of the four orders made by
B the magistrate. The issues for the High Court were: (i) whether the magistrate was right in refusing the further detention of the respondents; (ii) whether the magistrate was required to give reasons for rejecting the applications for further detention; and (iii) whether the orders to 'acquit and discharge' in the remand applications were
C correct.

Held (dismissing the application to set aside the orders made by the Magistrate in refusing the further remand):

D (1) Section 47D of the Act does not provide for the steps to be taken when a person arrested by the Fisheries Officer is produced before the magistrate whereas s. 117 of the CPC lays down strict procedural requirements to be complied with when a person arrested by the police is produced before a magistrate. The law has also imposed on the magistrate additional duties
E when an application for a remand order is made under s. 117 of the CPC. (para 12)

(2) The CPC is intended to be an exhaustive pronouncement of the law relating to criminal procedure in Malaysia. Section 3 of F the CPC lays down the general rule that all offences under the Penal Code as well as all offences in statutes other than the Penal Code must be inquired into and tried according to the same provisions of the CPC. However, if a particular statute prescribes a special procedure of trial or investigation governing
G offences committed under that statute, then that statute shall prevail over the CPC. This is the principle of generalia specialibus non derogant: a specific provision in a specific statute overrides a general provision in a general statute. Where the particular statute is silent on the procedure to be followed in an
H investigation the procedure laid down in the CPC shall then be applicable. (para 16)

(3) In the instant case, the IO had blatantly disregarded the procedure prescribed for further detention under s 47 of the Act,
I in that he: (i) failed to transmit his Investigations Diary to the magistrate; (ii) failed to state in the application before the magistrate that the application was in fact a second application to further remand the respondents when in fact the respondents had earlier been remanded for three days by the Assistant District Officer; and (iii) the IO had failed to state in the second application what he had been doing in the investigations of the alleged offence during the first three days of the remand granted by the Assistant District Officer. The magistrate was therefore correct in law in refusing to further remand the respondents. (para 19)

(4) Although s. 117 of the CPC does not stipulate that a magistrate must give reasons when rejecting an application for a remand order, it is desirable that a magistrate give reasons for rejecting an application for a remand order. This is to enable the High Court to determine whether the order rejecting the application was correct in law, when an application to revise the order of the magistrate is made in the High Court. In the instant case since the magistrate was correct in refusing the further detention of the respondents, the magistrate's failure to given reasons for rejecting the application was merely an irregularity. The failure to give reasons did not affect the personal liberty of the respondents. (para 20)

(5) It is wrong in law to use the phrase 'acquitted and discharged' in an application for a remand order. In rejecting an application, a magistrate should order the respondents to be released instead of to be 'acquitted and discharged'. (para 21)

(6) Pursuant to ss. 265, 266 and 267 of the CPC, the evidence taken down by magistrates in legible handwriting shall form part of the records of proceedings. It is therefore the duty of magistrates to ensure that their handwriting is legible and that others will have no difficulty in reading their notes. (paras 22, 23 & 24)

Teo Say Eng JC:

Application For Revision

[1] This is an application by the learned Legal Advisor of Malaysia Maritime Enforcement Agency, Tuan Azman bin Ahmad for a revision of the four orders made by the learned magistrate Puan Norashikin bte Mokhtar at the magistrates' court Manjung Perak in rejecting the applications for further detention of 19 Indonesian fishermen. The application for revision was made under s. 31 of the Courts of Judicature Act 1964 to be read with s. 323(1) and s. 325 of the CPC.

Facts Of Case

[2] On 12 March 2010 between 12.05pm and 1.35pm, 19 Indonesian fishermen (hereinafter to be referred to as the respondents) were arrested for illegally fishing in our Malaysian territorial waters in four unregistered foreign fishing vessels. The alleged offence was investigated under s. 15(1)(a) of the Fisheries Act 1985 which carries a fine not exceeding one million ringgit each in the case of the owner or master and one hundred thousand ringgit in the case of every member of the crew.

[3] On 13 March 2010 between 6.58pm and 7.15pm, since the investigation cannot be completed within the period of 24 hours all the 19 respondents were produced by the investigating officer, Encik Ramli bin Abdullah (hereinafter to be referred to as I.O.) before the Assistant District Officer Encik Rosdi bin Mohd Yaacob, Perak Tengah in four separate applications for a further detention of three days under s. 47D of the Fisheries Act 1985. The Assistant District

Officer of Perak Tengah ordered that all the 19 respondents to be detained for three days to enable the I.O. to complete the investigations.

[4] Since the investigation could not be completed, on 15 March 2010 the I.O. produced all the 19 respondents before the magistrate in Manjung, Puan Norashikin binti Mokhtar in four separate applications for a further detention from 15 March 2010 to 25 March 2010 to enable the I.O to complete the investigation.

[5] The grounds to support the said applications were as follows:

(a) Siasatan ke atas kes ini masih belum dapat diselesaikan.

(b) Melibatkan pengambilan keterangan tertuduh dan saksi yang ramai.

(c) Memerlukan keterangan pakar bagi pengesahan peralatan menangkap ikan.

(d) Memerlukan seorang pakar jurufoto untuk mengambil gambar-gambar yang berkaitan kes.

(e) Pakar pemetaan (JUPEM) diperlukan.

[6] All the four applications were rejected by the learned magistrate and all the respondents were ordered to be "dilepaskan dan dibebaskan dari tahanan reman". The learned Legal Advisor of Malaysia Maritime Enforcement Agency on 17 March 2010 applied to the High Court at Ipoh for a revision of the four orders made by the magistrate on 15 March 2010 on the ground that the magistrates' orders were wrong in law for two reasons:

(1) no reasons were given by the magistrate in refusing further detention of the respondents; and

(2) the orders of "dilepaskan dan dibebaskan" in the case of remand proceedings were wrong in law.

[7] I then called for the records of the four applications from the magistrates' court Manjung and had them registered as Criminal Revision Nos: 43-2-2010, 43-3-2010, 43-4-2010 and 43-5-2010. I then fixed the four Criminal Revisions for hearing on 23 March 2010.

[8] The issues before this court are:

(a) Whether the magistrate was right in law in refusing further detention of the respondents

(b) Whether the magistrate was required to give reasons for rejecting the applications for further detention and

(c) Whether the orders given ie, "dilepaskan dan dibebaskan" in such applications for a remand order were right in law.

[9] In determining the aforesaid issues, one must bear in mind that the applications were made under s. 47D of the Fisheries Act 1985 which provides a procedure where investigation cannot be completed within twenty four hours by a Fisheries Officer.

It is to be noted that s. 47D merely provides that where investigation cannot be completed within 24 hours, the Fisheries Officer may produce the suspect before a magistrate and the magistrate may authorize his detention for a term not exceeding 15 days on the whole. Section 47D unlike s. 117 of the CPC does not stipulate the procedure to be complied with in applying for a remand order before a magistrate.

The issue here is whether the procedure laid down in s. 117 is applicable to offences under the Fisheries Act 1985 where s. 47D is silent on the procedure to be followed where investigation cannot be completed within 24 hours by a Fisheries Officer?

[10] I append below s. 47D of the Fisheries Act 1985 and s. 117 of the CPC for easy reference.

Section 47D Fisheries Act:

Procedure where investigation cannot be completed within twenty-four hours by a Fisheries Officer.

(1) Whenever any person is arrested and detained in custody by a Fisheries Officer for an offence under this Act, and it appears that the investigation cannot be completed within the period of twenty-four hours from the time the person is arrested, any Fisheries Officer may produce such person before a Magistrate for the purpose of subsection (2).

(2) The Magistrate before whom such person is produced may, whether he has or has no jurisdiction to try the case, from time to time authorize the detention of such person in such custody as such magistrate thinks fit for a term not exceeding fifteen days on the whole.

Section 117 of the CPC:

Procedure where investigation cannot be completed within twenty-four hours.

(1) Whenever any person is arrested and detained in custody and it appears that the investigation cannot be completed within the period of twenty-four hours fixed by section 28 and there are grounds for believing that the accusation or information is well founded the police officer making the investigation shall immediately transmit to a Magistrate a copy of the entries in the diary hereinafter prescribed relating to the case and shall at the same time produce the accused before the Magistrate.

(2) The Magistrate before whom an accused person is produced under this section may, whether he has or has no jurisdiction to try the case, authorize the detention of the accused in such custody as follows:

(a) If the offence which is being investigated is punishable with imprisonment of less than fourteen years, the detention shall not be more than four days on the first application and shall not be more than three days on the second application; or

(b) If the offence which is being investigated is punishable with death or imprisonment of fourteen years or more, the detention shall not be more than seven days on the first application and shall not be more than seven days on the second application.

(3) The officer making the investigation shall state in the copy of the entries in the diary referred to in subsection (1), any period of detention of the accused immediately prior to the application, whether or not such detention relates to the application.

(4) The Magistrate, in deciding the period of detention of the accused person, shall take into consideration any detention period immediately prior to the application, whether or not such detention relates to the application.

(5) The Magistrate in deciding the period of detention of the accused shall allow representations to be made either by the accused himself or through a counsel of his choice.

(6) If the Magistrate has no jurisdiction to try the case and considers further detention unnecessary he may order the accused person to be produced before a magistrate having such jurisdiction or, if the case is triable only by the High Court, before himself or another Magistrate having jurisdiction with a view to transmission for trial by the High Court.

(7) A Magistrate authorising under this section detention in the custody of the police shall record his reasons for so doing.

Comparison Of The Two Provisions

[11] A comparison of the two provisions would show the similarities between the two provisions as follows:

(i) Both the provisions deal with what happens to a person who has been arrested and detained by the enforcement agencies and the enforcement agencies are not allowed to detain him for more than 24 hours.

(ii) The person arrested and not released shall without unreasonable delay, be produced before a magistrate.

(iii) Both the sections contemplate more than one application for the remand order. The magistrate is required to satisfy himself on every application if detention is at all necessary and if so to determine the length of time actually required to complete the investigation. Section 47D of the Fisheries Act does not limit the number of applications to be made but the maximum period for remand that may be granted as the magistrate thinks fit is 15 days on the whole. Whereas s. 117 of the CPC contemplates only two applications to be made and has limited a maximum of four days on the first application and three days on the second application in respect of offences punishable with imprisonment of less than 14 years and a maximum of seven days on the first application and another seven days on the second application in respect of offences punishable with death or imprisonment of 14 years or more;

What Is Missing From s. 47D

[12] Apart from the aforesaid similarities, s. 47D does not provide for steps to be taken when a person arrested by the Fisheries Officer is produced before the magistrate whereas s. 117 does lay down the strict procedural requirements to be complied with when a person arrested by the police is produced before a magistrate:

Section 117 has stipulated the following fundamental steps which must be taken by the enforcement agencies whenever an application for a remand order is made before a magistrate:

(1) It is mandatory for the enforcement agency to produce the investigation diary (hereinafter to be referred to as I.D). The I.D must meet the following requirements:

(a) It must be in the form specified by s. 119 of the CPC setting forth:

(i) The time at which the order, if any, for investigation reached him.

(ii) The time at which he began and closed investigation.

(iii) The place or places visited by him.

(iv) A statement of the circumstances ascertained through his Investigation: Dalam Mahkamah Rayuan Malaysia (Bidang Kuasa Rayuan) Rayuan Jenayah No. J-05-08-2002 Leonard Teoh Hooi Leong v. Pendakwa Raya.

(b) It must be replete with grounds indicating that the accusation or information against the person arrested is well founded: s. 117(1) CPC & Polis DiRaja Malaysia v. Audrey Keong Mei Cheng [1994] 3 CLJ 362; [1994] 3 MLJ 296 at 303.

(c) The grounds must show a nexus between the person arrested and the suspected offence: see In Re The Detention of S Sivarasa & Ors [1997] 1 CLJ 471.

(d) It must also explain the necessities of the case for remand or further remand.

(e) It must show whether diligent efforts in investigation have been carried out: see In Re Syed Mohammad Syed Isa & Ors [2001] 8 CLJ 247, Criminal Revision No: 43-03-2001, 45-3-2001, 43-06-2001 and 43-07-2001.

(f) It must state any period of detention of the person arrested immediately prior to the application whether or not such detention relates to the application: s. 117(3) CPC.

[13] The failure to transmit a copy of an ID or failure to satisfy one of the abovementioned requirements in the I.D. transmitted is fatal to the application as it meant that the magistrate did not have the prescribed material to act upon in her judicial enquiry whether to order further remand. She had no jurisdiction to make the order of remand: In Re The Detention of S Sivarasa & Ors [1997] 1 CLJ 471; PP v. Audrey Keong Mei Cheng [1997] 4 CLJ 702.

[14] The law has also imposed on the magistrate the following duties when an application for a remand order is made under s. 117 of the CPC before him:

(i) Before granting the remand order, the magistrate must satisfy himself that there are grounds for believing that the accusation or information is well founded: s. 117(1) CPC.

(ii) The magistrate shall take into consideration any detention period immediately prior to the application whether or not such detention relates to the application: s. 117(4) CPC.

(iii) The magistrate in deciding the period of detention, shall allow representations to be made either by the accused or through a counsel of his choice: s. 117(5) CPC.

(iv) If the magistrate has no jurisdiction to try the case and considers further detention unnecessary he may order the accused person to be produced before a magistrate having such jurisdiction or if the case is triable only by the High Court, before himself or another magistrate having jurisdiction with a view to transmission for trial by the High Court: s. 117(6) CPC.

(v) The magistrate authorising detention shall record his reasons for so doing: s. 117(7) CPC.

Whether The Strict Procedural Requirements Laid Down In s. 117 Of The CPC, Are Applicable To Section 47D Of The Fisheries Act 1985

[15] In determining whether the strict procedural requirements as laid down in s. 117 of the CPC are applicable to investigations of offences committed under the Fisheries Act 1985, s. 3 of the CPC may be of help in getting a solution to the issue raised. Section 3 of the CPC provides as follows:

> All offences under the Penal Code shall be inquired into and tried according to the provisions hereinafter contained, and all offences under any other law shall be inquired into and tried according to the same provisions: subject however to any written law for the time being in force regulating the manner or place of inquiring into or trying such offences.

[16] CPC was intended to be an exhaustive pronouncement of the law relating to criminal procedure in Malaysia. Prior to 10 January 1976, Criminal Procedure was governed by four separate codes, namely, one each for the Federated Malay States, the; Straits Settlements, Sabah and Sarawak. The Code was made applicable throughout Malaysia as from 10 January 1976 and it provides one common procedure for all offences. Section 3 of the CPC lays down the general rule that all offences under the Penal Code as well as all offences in statutes other than the Penal Code must be inquired into and tried according to the same provisions of the CPC. However, if a particular written law, for instance, a statute which lays down a special procedure of trial or investigation governing offences committed under that statute, then the statute shall prevail over the CPC. This is the principle of generalia specialibus non derogant: a specific provision in a specific statute overrides a general provision in a general statute.

[17] If, on the other hand, the particular statute which is supposed to regulate the manner of investigation or trial is silent on the procedure to be followed in an investigation the procedure laid down in the CPC shall then be applicable.

Whether The Applications Had Complied With Procedures Laid Down In s. 117 Of The CPC

[18] Having determined the procedure to be followed in an application for a remand order in respect of an offence investigated under the Fisheries Act 1985, the court has to examine the applications to determine whether the I.O has complied with the aforesaid procedures laid down under s. 117 of the CPC.

I append below one of the four standard applications put up by the I.O for a remand order under s. 47D of the Fisheries Act 1985 for easy reference.

(i) The application in respect of Ipoh Criminal Revision 43-2-2010 which is similar to the other three applications consists of the following documents which were marked as Lampiran A1, Lampiran C1 and Lampiran B1 respectively:

Issue A: Whether The Magistrate Was Right In Law In Refusing Further Detention Of The Respondents Under s. 47D Of The Fisheries Act 1985

[19] A perusal of the aforesaid documents put up in the application for further detention under s. 47D shows that there was a blatant disregard of the procedure laid down for application of this nature on the part of the I.O.

(a) First and foremost the I.O had failed to transmit an I.D for the magistrate to act upon in her judicial enquiry whether or not to grant the remand order. In fact the magistrate would be right in law, to refuse to order further detention of the respondents based on this ground alone.

(b) The I.O had also failed to state in the application before the magistrate that this was infact a second application to further remand the respondents where the respondents had earlier on been remanded for three days by an Assistant District Officer. What the I.O did was just to enclose the first application marked as Lampiran C1 made before the Assistant District Officer who had granted a remand order to detain the respondents from 13 March 2010 to 15 March 2010. It is not any document containing information which is produced before a magistrate can be regarded as a diary of the entries prescribed under s. 119 of the CPC. The exhibition of the first application in this case is therefore not sufficient to constitute copy of entries in the diary as prescribed under s. 119 of the CPC.

(c) Last but not least, the I.O had failed to state in the second application what he had been doing in the investigation of the alleged offence during the first three days of the remand period granted by the Assistant District Officer. It is to be noted that the contents of the first application before the Assistant District Officer and the contents the second application before the magistrate are identical.

What the I.O did was to reproduce the contents of the first application verbatim to apply for further remand before the magistrate. What he had amended were the heading of the application, and the period of remand requested. Nothing had been shown in the second application that diligent efforts had been carried out by the I.O during the initial three days of detention. For the above reasons, I find that the magistrate was right, in law, in refusing further remand of the respondents.

Issue B: Whether The Magistrate Was Required To Give Reasons For Rejecting The Application For Further Detention

[20] Duty to record reasons:

It is not disputed that the magistrate did not give any reasons for refusing the remand order. In the circumstances, the court would not know on what grounds the application was rejected. It is to be noted that s. 117 only requires the magistrate to give his reasons for authorizing any detention. This is important because it deprives a person of his personal liberty, a fundamental right as guaranteed under art. 5(1) of the Federal Constitution.

Failure to give reasons for such authorization may result in the order being set aside: see Lau Kong Peng & Ors v. PP [1998] 4 CLJ Supp 156. On the other hand, although s. 117 does not stipulate that a magistrate must also give reasons when rejecting an application for a remand order, I am of the view that it is desirable that a magistrate should give his reasons when rejecting an application for a remand order. This is to enable the High Court to determine whether the order rejecting the application was right in law, when an application to revise the order of the magistrate was made in the High Court. In the present case, since I had ruled that the magistrate was right in law in refusing further detention of the respondents for the reasons given above, I am of the view that the magistrate's failure to given reasons for rejecting the application was merely an irregularity as it does not affect the personal liberty of the respondents.

Issue C: Whether The Orders Given ie, "Dilepaskan Dan Dibebaskan" In An Application For A Remand Order Were Right In Law

[21] On the issue whether the order that is 'dilepaskan dan dibebaskan' was right in law, one must first understand the meaning of 'dilepaskan dan dibebaskan'. The phrase 'dilepaskan dan dibebaskan' if translated into the English Language means 'acquitted and discharged'. In the circumstances, I rule that the phrase used is wrong in law in an application for a remand order. In rejecting the application, the magistrate should order the respondents to be released instead of 'dilepaskan dan dibebaskan'.

A Other Issue: Handwritings Of The Magistrate

[22] Apart from the aforesaid issues, I would also like to raise another issue of the handwritings of the magistrates. The court notes that some magistrates have forgotten that it is a mandatory
B requirement for them to record the notes of proceedings, be it an enquiry or trial, in their legible handwritings. It is therefore my duty to remind them of ss. 265, 266 and 267 of the CPC which govern the manner of recording evidence in inquiries and trials. I append below the said provisions for easy reference:

C

Manner of recording evidence.

In inquiries and trials under this Code by or before a magistrate
D the evidence of the witnesses shall be recorded in the manner provided by this Chapter.

Section 266

Recording evidence in summons cases.

E

(1) In summons cases tried before a magistrate the magistrate shall, as the examination of each witness proceeds, make a note of the substance of what the witness deposes, and such note shall be written by the magistrate with his own hand in legible
F handwriting and shall form part of the record.

Section 267

Recording evidence in other cases.

G In all other trials before a Magistrate's Court and in all inquiries under Chapter XI, the evidence of each witness shall be taken down in legible handwriting by the presiding magistrate and shall form part of the record.

H [23] It is pertinent to note from the aforesaid provisions that the evidence taken down by magistrates in legible handwriting shall form part of the records of proceedings. It is therefore the duty of magistrates to ensure that their handwritings are legible and others will have no difficulty in reading their notes.

I

[24] If their handwritings were illegible, this would pose a problem to the High Court when a case comes up for revision from the Subordinate Court and the judge calls for the original records of proceeding from the Subordinate Court but is unable to read the handwritings of the presiding officers of the Subordinate Courts. This is exactly the problem which I was facing when I could not decipher the handwritings of the magistrate in her records of proceedings. I strongly believe that such problems could have been avoided had the magistrates taken the trouble to ensure that their handwritings were legible.

Decision

[25] For the above reasons, I disallow this application to set aside the four orders made by the magistrates in refusing further remand. I also order that the word 'dibebaskan' to be deleted from the magistrates' orders.
